Talks To Parents

DEAF EARS

By Agie Judson Feale. It regularly is necessary for Charlie's mother to call him four or five times before he attends to a request. How was such a habit established? How can Charlie be taught to respond promptly? Maybe Charlie's mother has always given her requests without first making sure that he was ready to listen. Perhaps she called him when he was busy at play. Possibly she interrupted him in the midst of interesting conversations, or shouted to him from another room with her own back turned to him. Perhaps she often made unnecessary requests and far too many of them. Perhaps she did not give him time to respond to her first command, quickly following it up with two or three repetitions so that he learned to expect repetition and urging. Charlie can be retrained if his mother will take pains to be sure that she has his attention when she first speaks to him. It will help if she will teach him to look straight at her when she begins to talk. To do this, she will probably have to stop whatever she is doing and give all her attention to Charlie, but this is necessary and will save time in the long run. She must refrain from interrupting him unnecessarily and try to enlist his interest in what she wants him to do so that it will seem worthwhile. She must be liberal in her praise whenever he responds promptly. She must give her command once and then wait patiently until he puts a last block into place or finishes a round trip on his express wagon. She must always make him feel that he is improving. Mrs. Old-Timer: "No, indeed. I just remained calm and collected."
